

Reflection 2.2

For the assignment I changed the Mona Lisa painting into a modern poster for a streaming service to observe how visual communication and modern technology can change the meaning of the famous art work. While creating the poster an interesting thing I noticed was ~~once~~ something leaves its original form and appears on the digital screen people can interpret it in different ways. Instead of viewing it as a masterpiece, one can see it as an advertisement for a mystery series. This experience also helped me understand John Berger's idea of how an artwork's meaning changes once it is reproduced. Furthermore adding a bold title, a catchy tagline, entertainment details along with a streaming service label completely changed the painting's feelings. The typography and layout change the focus its historic and artistic self to a modern - digital entertainment form. Even though the painting remains unchanged, the presentation shows an entirely different story. This ~~also~~ project also showed me how connected art and technology can be. People around the world can reinterpret artworks using photography, editing, designing etc. in creative ways and share with audience all around the world. Reinterpreting the Mona Lisa from a painting to a series poster changed how I used to know the original art and demonstrated the wonderful ways technology can reshape the experience of art in.
